North River Ice-Cakes.

ice Floes of To-Day and Those of Forty Years Ago.

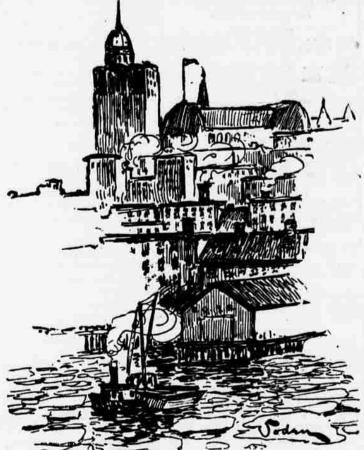

These cold mornings, when the weather is particularly fine, passengers over the Jersey City ferries on the Pennsylvania, Central Railroad of New Jersey and Eric boats find in the ice floes of the North River a great deal that claims their attention. They flock to the forward end of the big sidewheelers and scan the rivers surface, which nowadays is thickly studded with huge congealed masses.

It seems to be a source of continual delight for passengers to hang on to the iron gates and gaze wonderingly down at artist of THE EVENING WORLD and one of its reporters the other day—within the spacious, comfortable confines of the pilot's quarters, the wheelbouse—they would be willing to forgive all the vexatious delays in "making alips" on either side of the river.

You see, she couldn't make her slip at the foot of Barclay street properly on account of the piling up of the drift ice at the month of her slip. See, she has drawn out, and is away down almost at the Battery. She'll finally get in all O. K. when she works up under a good headway and gets a bead drawn right on the slip.

nothing out of the ordinary happens a trip in the wheelhouse is always a novelty to inded and ennuied ferry travellers. But at this frigid season, with the river running, at times, like a mill-race, with its great tretches of glossy ice-floes, it is a truly njoyable experience When the sun had reached its highest point in the canopy above, THE EVENING WORLD artist and the reporter climbed to the upper deck of one of the Pennsylvania's sliding door of the cosy wheelbouse. A pleasant, brown-eyed, thin-faced, rather weather-beaten looking man looked out from beneath the visor of a gold-braided cap, which bore the word "Pilot" across in the employ of the Pennsylvania road. He was a capital talker. "We haven't been bothered very much, so far this season, by ice, "he said. "You see it's rather early in the Winter yet, and the great bunks of ice have not started down the river, from the upper bays of Haver straw and those places. All this chewed-up looking, snowy, slusby, stuff is what we call drift ice. The hardest obstacles in this line are formed of immense stretches, unbroken tor hundreds of feet, and then we call it field ice. Later on field ice will foat down on us and then there'll be bother for

"This stuff to-day, however, causes us only a trifling inconvenience. It looks kind of nasty like and bothersome, but it's only a glittering bluff. Perhaps it will bother us a little in retarding the speed of the boats, but our encines are pretty powerful and we work through it beautifully.

"Now field ice is pretty solidly packed as it comes chasing down the river on an ebb tide and a good stiff northwest wind blowing.

It was a picturesque trip.

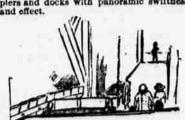

I remember, along back in the fifties, how the boys used to go skating way out in the North River, and sometimes go clear across to the Jersey side. There weren't so many ferry boats then, you must remember, and no efforts were made to bang away the said no efforts were made to bang away the said been betrayed by her lover.

IN THE SLIP.

As the prow of the boat crunched into the frozen stretches the occupants of the wheelhouse began to get a good shaking up. The little circular home of the helms man vibrated with a vivid distinctness which was entirely imperceptible to the deck passengers. It was much like the jarring and awaying of the "Congressional Limited" train which thunders along the steel rails of the Pennsylvania road towards the seat of Government at Washington.

It grew out of a protest against the illegality of the collection of certain taxes which had assent of Gov. Seliversion Padiwaki.
